It is now more than half a century since the Gaelic League was founded. By enthusiasm, hard work, and the sacrifice of youthful lives, the language and the culture of Ireland are in a stronger position to-day than in the days when Douglas Hyde and Fr. O'Gowney set forth on their mission; or in those Easter days of 1916 when Pearse and his comrades proclaimed by force of arms their faith in an Irish Ireland.

The task is not yet completed. The struggle goes on. In that part of Ireland which is free, in the six North-Eastern counties, awaiting freedom, in America, Australia, South Africa and in the cities and towns of Britain the flame that represents the ambition of an independent Gaelic Ireland remains undimmed. To this present generation of Irishmen and women untouched by the bitterness of civil strife, has been handed the task of bringing into reality an Ireland "Gaelic and Free."

In this final phase of the struggle, the Gaelic League of London, co-operating with other Irish organisations in Britain and at home, plans to play an important part. Our major objective is of course the language; to preserve it as the spoken language of Ireland, to encourage its use as a day to day medium of conversation among Irish men and women in this country, to educate the children of Irish parents in the history, the traditions and the language, to provide for the Irish in London Social Centres and entertainments of a Gaelic nature in a Gaelic atmosphere; to work without ceasing for the liberation of the six North-Eastern counties.

In these plans and activities there is a place for you. The programme that lies ahead will require the active co-operation of all members. If you are already a member, your task is to proclaim on every possible occasion your faith in the future of Ireland, to draw into the League those in your own particular circle who are not already members, to volunteer your time and energy for the tasks that are before us. If you are not a member, join this evening. Any of the Feis Stewards will give you the details of membership. Alternatively, write to the League Headquarters at 28 John Street, Holborn, W.C.1.
